THERE'S food for the superstitious in the fact that this year's Democratic deficit in the National Treasury is "13" million dollars.

While the Free-trade papers jubilate over the restorations voluntarily made in the wage schedules of some factories, they invariably forget to state that such increase does not make the rate of pay now received by the wage earners equivalent to their earnings in 1892. Another point to which they fail to refer is that, where wages have been ad-vanced, it is very often the case that such an advance was made to far fewer people than were employed in 1892. A firm may then have been employing 500 hands, and even if the same rate of wages should now be paid it is often the case that only 350 hands are employed. What then has become of the other 150? Has some other industry made such marked progress under Tariff reform as to be able to absorb these idlers? If so, why have not the Free-trade editors recorded the fact? It is most likely that the other 150 have either left the country or are tramping around still looking for that job which they had before they voted for CLEVELAND and Tariff
